PRESS RELEASE

Limassol, February 2009

sea chefs continues to invest in education and training of staff members

For over ten years, high standards of quality and service on board their cruise ships, river-going vessels and ferries, have been sea chefs key criteria for success. With exclusive management training for leading employees such as hotel managers and chefs on board the riverships run by sea chefs, the firm highlights once again its position as a company offering high-quality service in the shipping industry. 'It is precisely the training and continuing development of our staff that is indispensable to the satisfaction of our customers,' says Daniel Thiriet, manager of the Swiss branch of sea chefs. 'Through this management training we not only optimise the quality of service on board our ships, but through the exchange of employees experiences and ideas we also strengthen the capacity for teamwork and the sense of responsibility of each individual. We also do plan an extension of this concept for all staff members.'

Known for its expertise in trend-setting training concepts, the Schools of Tourism in Bad Gleichenberg, Austria, places particular value on participants' individual and flexible qualification measures. Professor Helmuth Hölbing, director of Schools of Tourism in Bad Gleichenberg, says: 'Our courses have a modular structure so they can be easily and comprehensively combined. A direct transference of what is learned is therefore possible and is of great importance to us. A high proportion of practice as well as mentoring of the participants before, during and after this seminar also secures long-term success, which is of benefit to the customers of sea chefs.'
